Ethnicity in Bosnia and Herzegovina

Group selection

The demographic data for 1992-1995 are from the 1991 Census and include information from before the war. The preliminary results of Bosnia and Herzegovina's 2013 census state an ethnic composition of 48.4% Bosniaks/Muslims, 32.7% Serbs and 14.6% Croats. No results were released for the Roma population (⁴⁵²).

Power relations

1992-1995

During the civil war, Bosnia and Herzegovina was broken apart into three parts, separatist Republika Srpska, the Croatian state of Herzegovina, and the Muslim Bosniak central government. Therefore the Serbs are coded as having separatist autonomy, the Bosniaks as senior partner and the Croats as junior partner. In 1994, the Muslim-Croat Federation was formed, which stopped the fighting between these two sides. The Dayton 1995 agreement ended the Bosnian civil war.

1996-2017

The Dayton Accord established a system of consociationalism. The Presidency rotates between representatives of the three ethnic groups - Bosniaks, Serbs, Croats - and similarly the Parliament and Constitutional Court have precisely determined shares of seats guaranteed to each ethnic group. Thus, all three groups are labeled "senior partners". The building of a common state for the two warring sides ended the fighting, but did not really lead to a stable "nation-state". It is more like a loose ethnic confederation which - while ostensibly ruled by a central, multi-ethnic government under a rotating presidency - is in fact held together largely by its status as an EU protectorate ruled by the High Representative. Each ethnic group is dominant in its traditional areas, especially as a result of the massive ethnic expulsions that occurred during the war.

Both governments formed in the meantime show this loose consociationalist character, but also the degree of political procedure that still needs to be worked out. On 28 December 2011, fifteen months after the October 2010 parliamentary elections, leaders of the main political parties in Bosnia and Herzegovina - the Social Democratic Party (SDP), the Union of Independent Social Democrats (SNSD), the Party of Democratic Action (SDA), the Croatian Democratic Union (HDZ), its sister party HDZ 1990, and the Serbian Democratic Party (SDS) - reached an agreement to form a state level government. The government consists of ten ministers, four Bosniaks, three Serbs and three Croats, thus there were no changes in the power states of the ethnic groups ⁽⁴⁵³⁾. The Tuzla Canton is the first in Bosnia and Herzegovina to receive a new government since the mass protests that started in February 2014 forced four cantonal governments to resign ⁽⁴⁵⁴⁾. After the parliamentary elections in 2014, it again took the country some months to form the new government (until April 2015). Again, however, all three ethnic groups are represented equally in the government.

The Roma are discriminated, because many “Roma lack birth certificates, identification cards, or a registered residence, preventing them from access to health care and public education services or registering to vote” ⁽⁴⁵⁵⁾. Roma experience a high level of poverty ⁽⁴⁵⁶⁾. In recent years, the number of Roma without identity documents decreased and their access to housing improved, however only marginally and insufficiently, which is why they are considered “discriminated” throughout. Furthermore, the National Strategy on Roma Integration ended by the end of 2016 without achieving its goals.
