Power relations

1946-1961

Due to their dominant political position in France, the ethnic French are coded as holding the power monopoly for all years - no sign was found for the explicit or implicit inclusion of other ethnicities into the national executive.

The Basques, represented by several political parties (such as the Abertzaleen Batasuna), were not integrated into any national government since 1946, and are therefore coded as being powerless. They do not have regional autonomy; although the Basque region has become a "pays" in 1997, it lacks fundamental budgetary powers for self-governance.

The Roma are coded as being discriminated throughout. Several facts support this decision. Until 2012, the voting rights of the Roma population were severely curtailed, as Non-French, European Roma had to be living for 3 years in one place to be allowed to vote in municipal elections, much longer than the lawful 6 months. The restriction of the fraction of Roma being able to live in one locality to a maximum of 3%, in place still today, severely restricts the capability of gaining access to the political system available to the Roma population (¹⁷³⁶). In addition to these direct political discrimination, the Roma in France experience violations of their human rights with regard to housing and education and are subject of discriminatory executive practices and discourses. Since 2010, it has become executive practice to deport non-French Roma to their countries of origin, even if this puts them at risk of discrimination and violence (¹⁷³⁷; ¹⁷³⁸). The Roma population in France is still considered to be discriminated politically as the 3% rule still applied and the "Travellers" (Gens de Voyage) still build their own administrative category with the obligation to present their "Traveller booklet" at a police station at least once per year (¹⁷³⁹).

1962-1991

A new period was introduced when the Corsician people gained relevance since the 60s, when movements for Corse nationalism and independence emerged. This movement saw outbreaks of political violence in the 70s. So far, Corse political agents or organizations were never included in the national executive, so the group is coded as being powerless for all years.

1992-2017

In 1991 a new statute was adopted by the French parliament, granting the island the special status of a territorial collectivity, so that Corse people are coded as having regional autonomy status.
