Ethnicity in Hungary

Group selection

We identify two politically relevant ethnic groups: Hungarians and Roma.

Power relations

1946-1992

Romas were discriminated, and Hungarians held a monopoly on power.

1993-2017

While the Roma are discriminated in almost all fields of social life and often target of violence, this discrimination is more social than political. Roma are able to vote (²¹⁰¹). Some discrimination even extends to lower levels of government (separated schools program in one municipality). The Roma face discrimination in the fields of education, employment, health, housing, and criminal justice. Their situation worsened after the financial crisis. They are targets of organized racist violence by right-wing radical paramilitary groups, such as the “Hungarian Guard” (²¹⁰², 236). In these cases law enforcement has been criticized as weak, though the Guard was banned by the court in 2009 (and yet continued to operate). Critics called on the authorities to characterize such crimes as hate crimes under the Hungarian Criminal Code and prosecute them as such.

However, officially government fights discrimination, and there are no signs of any targeted exclusion from political participation (²¹⁰³). The Roma minority remains highly underrepresented in all stages of government. In the 2006 spring elections, only 3 Roma candidates won seats in the parliament (Ibid, 238). Between 2010 and 2014, the Roma minority has held just four seats in the National Assembly. (²¹⁰⁴) The far-right party Jobbik is openly anti-Roma and further nourishes anti-Roma attitudes and is electorally successful (²¹⁰⁵). Although Fidesz, the leading party, generally distances itself from anti-Semitic statements, it is less vocal in its condemnation of anti-Roma behavior (²¹⁰⁶).

With the recent shift in Hungarian politics towards the right, Roma have become frequent targets of harassment and hate speech (²¹⁰⁷).
