Ethnicity in Venezuela

Group selection

According to the 2011 census, 2,7% of Venezuelans belong to indigenous groups. The population size of Afro-Venezuelans is more complicated: The 2011 census was the first census that included questions regarding the self identification as Afro-Venezuelans ("Afrodescendiente") which 0,7% answered positively. There was also the possibility to chose "black" ("negro") as a response which 2,9% of the population did (⁴⁶⁸³). These findings stand in stark contrast to estimations pronounced by the Interamerican Development Bank and several Non Governmental Organizations that assess that 10 to 15% of Venezuela's population are of African descent (⁴⁶⁸⁴, p. 225). Thus, we identify the following politically relevant ethnic groups: Afro-Venezuelans, White/Mestizos, and Indigenous peoples.

Power relations

1946-1972

During the "military decade" (1948-1958) (⁴⁶⁸⁵, p. 205) and the first decades of bipartisan democracy neither indigenous (⁴⁶⁸⁶, p. 156) nor Afro-Venezuelan people had any relevant influence on the political sphere (⁴⁶⁸⁷, 224) or were organized politically. Ethnicity is coded as politically irrelevant for all groups during this period.

⁴⁶⁸⁶ [Angosto, 2012]

⁴⁶⁸⁷ [García, 2007]

1972-1999

For indigenous peoples, their political situation began to change gradually since 1973, when the first regional indigenous organisation was created: the Federación de Indígenas del Estado de Bolívar (Indigenous Federation of the Bolívar State - FIB). It was the FIB that, in 1989, played a prominent role in the foundation of Venezuela's first national indigenous federation - the Consejo Nacional Indio de Venezuela (National Indian Council of Venezuela - CONIVE) (⁴⁶⁸⁸, p. 52). Until then Venezuelan indígenas did not have any platform to " (...) present themselves as a concrete and valid interlocutor in national politics (...)" (⁴⁶⁸⁹ p. 53).

⁴⁶⁸⁸ [Van Cott, 2003]

⁴⁶⁸⁹ [Van Cott, 2003]

Therefore, during this period, indigenous peoples are considered "powerless", whites/mestizos as holding a monopoly on political power, and Afro-Venezuelans as politically irrelevant.

2000-2017

Political support for the indigenous cause improved when Hugo Chávez became president in 1998 and initiated a constitutional reform process. The new constitution, adopted in 1999, guaranteed several distinctive rights to indigenous people, among others a quota for local, regional and national parliaments (⁴⁶⁹⁰, p. 155); indigenous peoples are coded as having regional autonomy from 2000 on. In the regional elections of the year 2000, an indigenous representative was elected as governor of the Amazon state "Amazonas". He was re-elected twice (in 2006 and 2012) (⁴⁶⁹¹). Problematically, the representation of Indigenous peoples in Venezuelan politics has even been reduced in recent years, due to reasons found in political repression strategies rather than in ethnical discrimination: The three seats in the national assembly, constitutionally guaranteed to the indigenous peoples, remain empty after the December 2015 elections, due to annulation by the TSJ because of alleged voter fraud (⁴⁶⁹²: 35). On the regional level, elections of 2016 have been postponed to the end of 2017 by the National Electoral Council (CNE) (⁴⁶⁹³: 2). In the meantime the Indigenous governor of the Amazon state, a prominent member of the opposition movement, was banned from office for 15 years in May 2017 (see ⁴⁶⁹⁴). However, the January-1st coding rule implies that "regional autonomy" holds true for the indigenous peoples throughout 2017.

On the contrary, Afro-Venezuelans are still not officially recognized as a minority group (⁴⁶⁹⁵, para. 12). In 2000, the "Red de Organizaciones Afrovenezolanas" (an umbrella organization that unites 23 regional Afro-Venezuelan organizations under its roof) was created, thereby allowing Afro descendants to articulate their demands more effectively (⁴⁶⁹⁶, p. 230), and justifying the inclusion of Afro-Venezuelans as politically relevant. Afro-Venezuelans remain underrepresented in politics and still face inequalities in access to education and health, despite recent efforts of the government to counter such problems (⁴⁶⁹⁷: 7; ⁴⁶⁹⁸: 2). Since the 2011 census, people at least are given the opportunity to self-identify as Afro-descendants (⁴⁶⁹⁹: 2). Those improvements have not yet translated into any mandates in executive politics on the national or regional level. Afro-Venezuelans are coded as "powerless".
